June 23, 2017 by ProofreadingPal in Writing Guides OK, last time I talked about good parallelism and chronology in sentence structure. Both of those address clarity. But there's so much more. This time, we'll talk about how you can emphasize your points through sentence structure, which is both sneakier and more effective than ALL CAPS IN BOLD AND ITALICS WITH EXCLAMATION POINTS!!! and the like. Sure, format and punctuation work, but the problem is that such tricks very quickly lose their power. Think of listening to someone who has to swear every other word. At first, there is an impact. But too much cursin' and cussin' just gets distracting, then annoying. Using sentence structure for emphasis does not get distracting even if you do it all the time (with one exception, which I'll talk about in a minute) because readers won't usually notice what you're doing and won't mind even if they do. Know the Stress Points of Your Sentences Just like paragraphs and papers, sentences have a beginning, middle, and end. The beginning and end are both stress points, while the middle tends to muffle words. It's the reason lawyers and politicians like passive voice. Let's say you're discussing that the US sale of prescription opioids increased by a factor of four during the period from 1999 to 2014. This is pretty awful, so it's tempting just to put the whole thing in italics and stick an exclamation point at the end: US sales of prescription opioids quadrupled from 1999 to 2014! Or you might be more selective with your italics: US sales of prescription opioids quadrupled from 1999 to 2014! But in both cases, notice that stress still naturally falls on "US" and the dates involved and the amount of increase. So: From 1999 to 2014, the sale of prescription opioids in America quadrupled. Not sure if this is enough emphasis? Note that it does not help at all now to italicize the word: From 1999 to 2014, the sale of prescription opioids in America quadrupled. The word is already emphasized by its placement. Using italics looks more hysterical than emphatic. Check these out. In the

A good writer stresses points by the use and placement of words, not by dressing them up. Warning: Repetition OK, so I said that using sentence structure for emphasis does not get annoying because it works so subtly. The exception is repetition. Great writers can use repetition. Great writers can use repetition to great emphatic effect, such as Rev. King: I have a dream that one day on the red hills of Georgia the sons of former slave owners will be able to sit down together at the table of brotherhood. I have a dream that one day even the state of Mississippi, a state sweltering with the heat of injustice, sweltering with the heat of oppression, will be transformed into an oasis of freedom and justice. I have a dream that my four little children will one day live in a nation where they will not be judged by the content of their character. And that's fantastic stuff. But most of us don't not be judged by the color of their character. And that's fantastic stuff. But most of us don't not be judged by the color of their character. write that well. The kind of repetition for emphasis I usually see on the job reads more like: It was hot. Really hot. Seriously, I'm talking hot. I thought it was hot yesterday, but that right now we have to act before it's too late. This gets old fast. I mean, really fast. If you use it once in an article or e-mail, don't use it again. It's gotten old that fast. Old. Fast. (You can also use fragments another day.) For now, I urge you to bear your readers in mind whenever you want to highlight something. Keep the tricks down to a

The name indicates the existence of the same conception regarding sacred edifices in Assyria as in Babylonia, where we find such names as E-Kur ("mountain house") for the temple of Bel at Nippur, and E-Saggila ("lofty house") for Marduk's temple at Babylon and that of Ea at Eridu, and in view of the general dependence of Assyrian religious beliefs as of Assyrian culture in general, there is little reason to doubt that the name of Assur's temple represents a direct adaptation of such a name as E-Kur, further embellished by epithets intended to emphasize the supreme control of the god to whom the edifice was dedicated. In general it is the simple homely virtues that are enjoined on men in Proverbs - there is no mention of courage, fortitude, intellectual truthfulness, and no recognition of beauty as an element of life; the ethical type is Semitic, not Hellenic, and the sages emphasize only those qualities that seemed to them to be most effective in the struggle of life; their insistence on the practical, not the heroic, side of character is perhaps in part the consequence of the position of the Jewish people at that time, as also the silence respecting international ethics belongs to the thought of the times. The result is to emphasize (a) the inveterate and indissoluble connexion between religious, social and political life, (b) the differences between the ordinary current
